The number of people with heart failure is increasing and it is now the most common reason for hospitalization in the United States. Nearly half of all patients with heart failure have preserved ejection fraction, and patients with heart failure and atrial fibrillation have a substantially higher incidence of left ventricular hypertrophy. The condition of heart failure is characterized by fluid retention, increased pulmonary vascular resistance, and reduced cardiac output. The clinical manifestations of heart failure, its diagnosis, and its treatment options have been the focus of significant research. These articles address the current therapeutic challenges and emerging directions in the management of heart failure. Sampling of fractionated tissues of rhesus monkeys and humans by a new tissue sampling device. A tissue sampling device is described which can be used to sample a specific number of fractions of solid human or monkey tissues. The size of the fractions which can be obtained in a single run (about 0.5 cm<sup>3</sup>) varies between 1 and 10 mm. The device is based on a wedge-shaped steel cylinder which is filled with the tissue sample and embedded in an agarose block. Sections are cut by rotation of the cylinder. Slices from the different levels within the cylinder are collected in individual specimen containers, which can be transferred to the laboratory by hand. By using a rotating cylinder with 100 different sectors and a rotating blade, a uniform sampling of the tissue is obtained. The sample is always from the top, and from every direction on the cylinder. The diameter of the cylinder can be made as small as desired, and the contents of the cylinder can be cut into sections from a specific thickness onwards. The slicing force is generated by the rotation of the cylinder. In monkeys, the device was used to sample a 1 cm<sup>3</sup> tissue of lung, brain, heart, kidney, liver, spleen, eye and skin. For each type of tissue about 30 samples were collected and stored in formaldehyde. In addition, a series of slices (25 microns) was taken from the different levels within the cylinder to be stained with haematoxylin and eosin, phosphotungstic acid haematoxylin and PAS for light microscopy. The effect of sectioning on the tissue structure was estimated using a semiquantitative score. As far as the sampling technique is concerned, the device can
